John Yorke makes a very good case for the five-act, as opposed to three-act, structure. Most books on writing structure do break the second act into two related parts, which gives you - ta-da! - five parts. Yorke's breakdown of the purpose of these acts, all different but interrelated, makes sense.

On John Yorke's INTO THE WOODS - The Script Blog

Act one and act five, act two and act four and both halves of act three – all echo and mirror each other around the midpoint. Further, in an absolutely archetypal story, the crisis in act two will work like an inciting incident – directly related to its mirror image, the crisis point in act four. — John Yorke, Into the Woods
